High diving should be prohibited, or at least restricted, by legal enactment. There never is any danger, of course, until some one gets killed or maimed for life. Up to a conple of years ago, acts in which high diving was a feature were frequently seen in the vandeville theatres, but an accident, resulting in death, led the most influential manager of that form of entertainment to forever prohibit such exhibitions in his theatres, and no one ever misses them. There is a law against suicide, and recklessness of this kind is not far removed from the deliberate taking of one's life.

> The fight in the city between Tammany and the elevated road is growing still more bitter and venomous. It seems to be an instance of blackmailing an institution that is quite open to blackmail because of the fact that the rights of the public have been ignored for years by that institution under the protection of Tammany. In effect the case is about as if any law-breaker should refuse to pay out money to the word "pantata ' any longer, and the Tammany police should then swoop down in a righteous raid. In the present instance, both Tammany and the elevated suffer somewhat, but the public may apparently get some benefit. The old saw as to the advantage which comes to honest men when thieves fall out, is again justified in its wisdom.
